「弱さ」から始まる学際研究— 刑事政策の研究者から見た「社会」とアカデミア

Interdisciplinary Research Based on 'Vulnerability': Society and Academia from Criminological Perspective

Summary

Researches in criminal policy focus on social problems relating to crime and delinquency, by analyzing the relevant laws and systems. These researchers have a social responsibility to engage with both specialist communities and a wider society in order to address issues affecting prisoners or crime victims, that are often overlooked by the majority.

Recently, universities and academia, especially in Japan, have expected researchers to collaborate with major institutions such as the government or large companies as a form of 'social implementation'. Conversely, the strength of criminal policy research is asking questions from human vulnerabilities and engaging with 'society'. This approach will generate new ideas for interdisciplinary research that improve the well-being of diverse people.
